According to Google's Webmaster Guidelines, "if an uncaught HTTP error occurs on your server, the error code should be returned to Webmaster Tools" and it should be returned in the HTTP response. However, according to this post, Google's Webmaster Tools service is not accepting error codes other than 404 anymore. Does anyone know if it's possible to still get the error codes in Google's Webmaster Tools service? A: According to Google's Webmaster Guidelines, "if an uncaught HTTP error occurs on your server, the error code should be returned to Webmaster Tools" Not really. What they mean is: if an HTTP error occurs in a page's response, it should be sent to Google and indexed by them (i.e. it should not be a 404, but a 500 error). For error codes other than 404, you are free to configure your server in a way that you are returning them on your own, as long as Google can handle them: Not sure how Google webmaster tools can handle a 403 error. But I guess it should. I don't know if 404s work in Google Webmaster Tools. If not, you can configure them to not do so by setting a custom 404 handler. However, according to this post, Google's Webmaster Tools service is not accepting error codes other than 404 anymore. They are simply not acknowledging your error codes anymore, because a lot of pages are sending the old "4xx or 5xx error codes" (error code I also told them about in another question a while back). When I first told them that, they responded with "404 is still the only one we accept". Does anyone know if it's possible to still get the error codes in Google's Webmaster Tools service? Yes, but it's probably not what you are looking for. You will most likely receive a PHP error. If you 82157476af
